Pseudo-Random Number Generators (PRNGs)

Essentially, PRNGs are algorithms that use mathematical formulae or simply precalculated tables to produce sequences of numbers that appear random. A good example of a PRNG is the linear congruential method.

There are no numbers that are picked more frequently for all random number generators.

And for true (not pseudo-random) number generators the results should match whatever distribution the values are over, so a normal distribution will pick values near the mean more frequently than extremal values.

Are there numbers that are more likely to be picked in random generators ...
